In spite of all, my friend, we hope, if we shall be faithful to ourselves and to our God, to defeat his perfidious plans, and, by the help of Providence, to inflict upon him the punishment he merits, No. XXX. Miss Lydia Macdonalp to her Sister. 12th August, Every person here assumes a brave and warlike attitude. God bless our armies, and make our success equal to the desire we feel of extirpating from the face of the earth a monster so greedy of human blood. You can easily imagine in what way we already experience the sad effects of war: No day passes without witnessing the ruin of the most opulent commercial houses; judge then of the situation of those possessing less brilliant resources. (9) (9) These invectives originate in the ignorance of the English people with respect to the secret intrigues of the Ministry, pretty completely developed in Lord Grenville s letter, No. I, No. XXXI. A. Stewart to his Cousin. I Have not time to furnish you with much news: I can only tell you that all England is in arms. While the Consul lives, he will suffer no part of the world to remain in tranquillity, and old England being the only spot which can obstruct his ambitious designs, he has pledged himself to invade it at the head of 300,000 men. We are, consequently, preparing for the event, and mean to give him a reception he little expects....
