F64814 2007u OCLC Number: (OCoLC)193901984 Subject: Terrorists -- Government policy -- United States. Excerpt: . . . 12 the explosion came from the cargo hold, a secure area of the air-craft that Mr. Posada Carriles, or anyone on his behalf, would not have had access to and not from, as the prosecution contended, from the bathroom area. Forensic examinations were secretly conducted at the behest of the countries of Trinidad and Venezuela by a British Government laboratory by the name of Lararde - which is an acronym for Royal British Forensic Examinations Laboratory; in other words, it is a function of the British Government - and a forensic expert from England by the name of Eric Newton, who performed tests on whatever evidence was left from the bombing. Both failed to con-firm the chemical signature of the explosives that the prosecution contended had come from the bathroom. Those are just some of the multiple reasons why a Venezuelan military tribunal, after a full trial and over 3 years of investigation acquitted Mr. Posada Carriles of all charges. It is further the rea-son why, after a seemingly endless round of reviews, the Ven-ezuelan civilian prosecutors recommended that the verdict of ac-quittal that had been entered into as a result of the military tribu-nals 4 years of examination be affirmed. Despite this recommendation, and purely for political reasons to appease Fidel Castro, Mr. Posada Carriles was not released from custody and served an additional 8 years of prison waiting for the courts endless reviews to conclude. When it became apparent to him that the legal process in Venezuela was being subverted by the influence of international considerations, primarily pro-Castro ele-ments within the Government of...
