Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: .Railroad Company objectively gave a concrete idea of its plans of operation in the various locomotives, train make-ups, and methods of bringing to and carrying away from Pittsburgh the products of the district. Another float of this company luminously represented the progress in manufacturing and in transportation by a great factory on the bank of a river with railroad trains, steamboats, barges and stage coaches of the first half of the preceding century on the bank and in the river as punctuators of the progress of facilities within later years. Manufacturers had in line sixteen floats equipped by dry goods firms, commercial concerns, associated banks, the Flour and Feed Exchange, lumber dealers, and many other firms and corporations. Each of the floats was accompanied by escorts of about one hundred men, many in uniform and not a few very picturesquely attired. The floats were drawn by...
